FUNERALS. - In this country we have been remarkably free from the ostentatious extravagance so common among people retaining distinctions of rank, but we have not escaped the infection of the formalism which is such a marked feature of funeral follies. One need only go into a mourning store to see that there are fashions even in grief. Shades and textures delicately are graduated to degrees of affliction. from the sorrow which shrouds itself in the depest black to the pleasing melancholy which is consoled by lavender; from the simple dress of sincere grief to the elaborate attire of a hypocritical and ostentatious sadness. The hearses with glass sides, which are sometimes seen in city streets, make a parade of the very coffin that should be sacred from unsympathetic gaze, and like the fashions in mourning fabrics, encourage extravagance among a class of people the least able to afford it, often stinting the living to uselessly decorate the caskets of the
